Indeed, Simon Gaunt argues compellingly that gender discussions are constitutive of the romance genre - discussions of what it means to be male and what it means to be female, of what defines masculine and what defines feminine, which are framed in romance in ways that epic could not accommodate. This process of becoming, an integral part of the romance and particularly of the German Arthurian romances by Hartmann von Aue and Wolfram von Eschenbach offers a series of possibilities to be explored and negotiated throughout any particular narrative, and these negotiations structure an ongoing process of defining gender in a social context, both publicly and privately.
